Home video Home video is a term used to describe the mass media in the early 20th century. Home video recording of motion picture films was a relatively new concept. The early home movie industry was essentially an extension of the in-home movie theater of the 1890s. It was during the early days of video recording that the first film-related patents were issued. The concept of home video was further solidified when the introduction of the CED video disk player in 1982 paved the way for the increasingly widespread use of video cassette recorders (VCRs) for video viewing. During the early to mid-1990s, the emergence of cable television along with the advent of digital technology saw a massive increase in the popularity of both home video recording and video on demand (VOD).
