In both Lightroom and Photoshop, you have the ability to edit one image at a time. Photoshop, like most office applications, is best for editing a single image at a time but searching through a collection of images can take a long time. Lightroom, on the other hand, uses a drag and drop interface — placing one or more images in a large box and then dragging the image or images into a collection of images based on type, date, or location, for example. This means the entire collection is available at once, making it easier to find all the images you want to work with. You can, of course, also use it the other way round. Drag and drop images into an album to create a single image album. History is also available when you right click on any individual image. In this history you can go back many steps and undo your edits. This might seem like a minor difference but for us it's not. Lightroom has become indispensable in our workflow and even though we do still edit some large jobs in Photoshop and Lightroom we find that the convenience and speed of Lightroom is worth it just for the fact that we no longer have to have Photoshop running and the images "lost" in the background. But if you're a noob (like us) and Photoshop is your jam, keep playing along. Gorilla is and will always be focused on providing the best experience possible for all of its users. Starting with lightroom v6 there was a conscious decision to move towards a workflow where you'll be able to focus on just the job at hand eliminating the hundreds of options we've added over the years to distract from it. Our goal is to provide tools you'll be able to use to your advantage and make high quality content to share with the world. 933d7f57e6
