I owned the 4.0 version of Lightroom when it arrived on the scene and I quickly settled on it as my preferred lightroom. And then the 5.0 came out. The only real complaint I had was with the Nikon raw converter. If you shoot Nikon, this is a great camera, but unless you like using Nikon's proprietary raw converter, it's a pretty crappy experience. (You can download it for free from Nikon's site, but it's a pretty stupidly complicated piece of software.) While Lightroom still has a lot to offer, it no longer has just two owners (well, I guess it still does, there's always one version of Lightroom in the App store); now it has a slew of different users who use it globally throughout the world. It is important to understand that for the Adobe guys, Lightroom is an app, not a single app or a program. It's a set of apps, some built within Adobe, some "Third-Party Plugins", and it's apps that have a global footprint. And much like an app, any update to Photoshop is usually a hugely complicated hack of features (the latest update to the CC 2018 was a whopping 96 changes!). You can expect this to continue. You can find many tutorials on the web, most of which overlap each other and don't always make sense. It is important to have a good understanding of the manuals to understand what and why you're doing (and why not!) the things you're doing. When I first got into Lightroom, I found it almost impossible to understand anything when I first looked at a screen, so I got a keyboard shortcut keyboard and started up a fresh, clean project and printed out my first shots. I spent hours going through the tutorials on the Home pages and on various forums. The best thing to do is to do it your way to find out who you are. Some people prefer to use presets for every job, others prefer to do it the hard way and learn what Lightroom can do and how it can do it. That's the beauty of learning a new software: you can do it your own way. This will not only help you learn, but it's a hands-on approach that will eventually leave you with superior skills beyond a preset.

When used in conjunction with color correction and some of the image enhancement tools in Photoshop, adaptively blending images can provide a high-quality, low-dynamic-range look to photos that would otherwise look underwhelming or unnatural. As you can see in the image above, images that lack sharpness—shown in the dark areas of the leaf (left), the water droplet (center), and some of the sky (right)—tend to appear flat. By contrast, the tonal balance (the brightest areas of the leaf, droplet, and sky) is often a natural result of the natural tonal gradation of the natural world rather than anything an artist did. With no sharpness difference, there's no focal point to create a screen line. Our eyes are less accurate to the sharpness in these areas because they naturally average out the sharpness to create a flattened blur of the edges. It's as if we have added a hand-held vignette to the image to soften the edges. That's why creating a screen line takes less effort and typically looks cleaner. Without sharpness difference, the gradient filter feature offers the same benefits a screen line offers, but with different results. The same areas of an image that appear evenly toned to the eye appear as a gradient in Photoshop. The closer the [baseline] is to a [bright] [dark] [high] or [low] [color], the sharper the image will appear to the eye. Similarly, images that lack sharpness will look less sharp. This is why it is less accurate to change the exposure of an image with the camera-lens and Color
